

Summary

This bachelor thesis titled Social rehabilitation of persons with mental illness: termination of this social service and prevention of addiction to this type of social service aims to describe the topic of social rehabilitation of persons with mental illness with special focus on issue of termination this type of social service and prevention of addiction to this type of service, and also to present a point of view of social workers who are working in social rehabilitation with this target group via a qualitative research.

The thesis is divided into two parts – a theoretical and an empirical one. The theoretical part contains five chapters dealing with serious mental illness, impact of this illness to man's life and his closest people, social rehabilitation, termination of social service and prevention of addiction to social service. The empirical part contains an analysis of the interviews taken with seven respondents who are working in social rehabilitation with persons with mental illness for several years. The interview's subject was the respondents' outlook on the issues of termination of social rehabilitation of persons with mental illness and prevention of addiction on this type of social service.