

Abstract

The bachelor thesis is concerned with an interconnection of an individual's birth order with perceived relationship satisfaction. Emphasis is placed on particular aspects that indirectly affect subjective satisfaction of partners. The aim of the thesis is primarily to describe psychological links between birth order and romantic relationship satisfaction. The literary overview focuses on defining birth order and its types. Further, the thesis describes personality specifics of siblings and possible causes of their variability. Attention is also given to specific romantic relationship beliefs, sexual strategies and tendencies of mate selection concerning birth order that also affect perceived relationship satisfaction. In the empirical part is presented research that aims to find out which bond of partners from the perspective of psychological birth order is connected with higher relationship satisfaction.
