

Summary

ZEMÁNEK Jindřich: Human, society and the punishment, Prag: Catholic Theological Faculty of Charles University, 2010, 74 s.

In this Diploma Dissertation Human, society and the punishment the author deals with issues concerning authorization of the state to punish the human individual, although this is – as the image of God – an autonomous and free being.

As even the title suggests, the work consists of three parts. In the first part the author deals with man as a person created in God's image, but also a person of impaired reality of sin. The second part deals with society as a necessary condition for personal development of man. Here the author also touches on state's eligibility to use the means of coercion against its citizens, then in the third and final section talks about the penalty as one of the means of maintaining social peace.
