

Summary

In my thesis I have decided to perform an analysis of issues relevant to the development of zoning and territorial planning from the perspective of a public health protection authority.

I think it is important to point out that the legally established approach used to define "supervision" was different in 2000, when the relevant legislation applicable to health protection regulated specific areas of supervision than Act No. 258/2000 Coll., which is currently in force and which determines health risk evaluation process.

A part of my work explains the relationship between the evaluation of impacts on sustainable development of the relevant area, the assessment of environmental impacts and assessment of impacts on public health, which are principles that need to be taken into consideration when performing zoning and territorial planning.

The current legislative amendment enforced by the Building Act together with the health risk assessment principle (and related evaluation of impacts on public health), provides consistent protection of public interests during zoning and territorial planning. These are activities and measures necessary for the creation and protection of healthy living conditions.

The approach of public health authorities towards the implementation of opinions and ideas in terms of zoning and territorial planning is not restricted by the fact that the Act No. 258/2000 Coll. does not specify public interests in territorial planning (as the earlier legislation), but quite contrary, it is strengthened by the fact that public health authorities monitor impacts on human health during zoning and territorial planning.

Reference to the actual text of the paragraph, especially to the currently valid legislation, was reduced down to the necessary minimum, because legal regulations are often subjected to frequent amendments, even though the basic "principle and procedures" remain the same.

In the final section, I have given a concrete example of one of the phases of the creation of zoning and territorial documentation and presented information describing the acquisition of a key strategic document created for the Jihomoravský Region, which represents Basic principles of territorial development for the Jihomoravský Region (South Moravian Region).
