

This thesis deals with a grammatical phenomenon, so called as „structure of the type er kam gelaufen“. This structure is built of a connection of the definite verb „kommen“ with the past participle of other verbs. The summarization of the description from grammar books of German language is followed by the analysis of the collected examples. It is being probed, how often does the structure occur on Internet and in which sorts of texts and genres, in which tenses and moods is it provable. Further is being searched, which other past participles can be connected with the verb „kommen“ and if the examples lean towards the conceptually written pole or the conceptually spoken pole. Another important issue is the translation into the Czech language. The data from the grammar books are being compared with the real use in the conclusion.