

Abstract

At the same time when Czechoslovakia came into existence, Freemasonry started to establish and develop in that new country. Many new lodges were created all over the state, but the centre was in Prague. The independent Grand lodge The National Grand Lodge of Chzechoslovakia had existed since 1923 and the members were Czechs and Slovaks together. That system was involved in international structures in the interwar period. The thesis focuses on an analysis of relationship between Czech a French Freemanors inter two world wars. The two-way communication of members from both countries is analysed by visits, correspondence, giving an honorary memebership, etc.

The other object of research is frequency of communication and its changes in time. The thesis also deals with three questions: if the succesfully cooperation of both countries was based on the Grand lodge or its individual members and if the relationship of the countries was at official or unofficial level and how many persons were involved.
